The only thing that differs between them is a name value that user can set. I don't want to create a class for that, I am thinking that this can be done in a Model's `__init__` method. I tried something like this but it doesn't seem to work. I am pretty new to django so any tips are greatly appreciated. The problem is that it tries to add values to all of the properties of the class. `def __init__(self): self.property_name = None for x in range(10): self.property_name = "property_%d" % x` A: Your model should have properties: `class Model(models.Model): # Your properties` And since you mention that you want to set the property only one time, you can override the `__init__` method. `def __init__(self, *args, kwargs): self.property_name = "property_%d" % kwargs['id']` `class Model(models.Model): id = models.IntegerField(primary_key=True) # Your properties` `def __init__(self, *args, kwargs):`

You can play this great game either on portable or PC but this game is not designed for more than one player. The gameplay is pretty easy while in single player mode. How to Download?
