Abdominal and pelvic masses in children. Adults generally undergo a thorough physical examination for all possible causes of a mass. Children may present with abdominal and pelvic masses secondary to a congenital or acquired malformation. A thorough physical examination should include careful attention to the entire abdomen. Acute peritonitis may be the only clue to a ruptured appendicitis or a ruptured omphalocele, whereas a palpable mass may be the clue to the presence of an asymptomatic Meckel's diverticulum or a symptomatic, growing teratoma. Familiarity with the clinical presentation of masses and accurate diagnosis by the radiologist is imperative in order to select patients for a minimally invasive surgical approach or percutaneous biopsy. In pediatric cases, attention to adequate fluid resuscitation and the use of pain management modalities to prevent significant physiologic derangement and intraoperative fluid-electrolyte imbalances are imperative. // Copyright (C) 2015 Davis E.
